Earlier this week, we discussed the. Essentially, the idea is to attract more Saints fans to the site, but some are wondering whether or not these kinds of tweets, especially for those who tweet for advertising companies instead of the company being sponsored. That, apparently, has been something Michael Vick has been doing for a couple of companies, as you can see for yourself: Mike Vick Follow and get his Bizzy Diet Fat Loss plan and the Get Swole plan tweeted out to u. via web & middot; powered by, Mike Vick Check out these prizes from the McDonald ' s monopoly game & gt; & gt; – sponvia & middot; powered by Actually, Vick has been tweeting for a company called MyLikes, and they have companies — like McDonald ' s — who buy into their program, leading to tweets from Mike Vick about McDonald ' s Monopoly. The truth is, McDonald ' s does not employ Vick, but because of their partnership with MyLikes, as well as Vick ' s, we have another vicarious partnership between the two, even though neither entity approached one another. In fact, I ' m not sure how McDonald ' s would feel about a person with Vick ' s record being a spokesperson, regardless of his post-incarceration popularity. Furthermore, you ' ll notice only one of those tweets has the “ spon ” abbreviation, indicating they are indeed pay-for-tweet posts. Over at Darren Rovell ' s awesome sports business blog, Influencers like Vick get paid for their tweets, but what about McDonald ' s? Do they know what celebrities are tweeting out their links? I assume they didn ' t since confusion ensued when I originally asked if Vick and the brand were associated. That ' s a problem if a social media company just guarantees clicks and doesn ' t tell the client who is tweeting. In the case of Vick, he ' s a potentially controversial figure and once he blatantly tweets about a promotional campaign, it ' s assumed that he ' s a part of your brand. Is that kind of relationship confusion good or bad for product promotion? What happens if McDonald ' s doesn ' t want to be associated with Vick? Do they tell MyLikes to have everyone tweet about them except Vick? Welcome the future of social media marketing. How would you address a sports figure you didn ' t necessarily approve of tweeting about your products, all because you signed up with a social media marketing company? If you use the Internet, there ' s a good chance you ' ve seen or at least heard of the “Hitler Reacts” videos. There are a ton of them. Just go to YouTube and search “Hitler reacts” or “Hitler ' s reaction” and you ' ll see videos of Hitler reacting to Rebecca Black ' s Friday, the iPad, the infamous Kanye West VMAs incident, Modern Warfare 3, the Playstation Network getting hacked, Michael Jackson ' s death, Osama Bin Laden ' s death, Muse albums, football games, and many other things. Suffice it to say, it ' s a popular meme. Naturally, the Google Panda Update has now been commemorated with one (I ' m surprised it took this long). In it, Hitler is informed that his sites have been hit by the update. Google continues to make changes to the authorship element it displays in search results. Yesterday, we reported on Google now letting you set it up by, though this makes your email address public, and not all people will want to do this. Here are a couple of videos from Google we looked at a while back, explaining how to implement authorship markup: About a month ago, we looked at Google adding circle counts for some authors in search results. Today, they announced this and a couple more changes to go with it. Now, they ' re showing circle count, “add to circles,” and comments. “You should be able to easily engage with and hear more from authors you like, so we ' re making that easy by allowing you to add authors to your circles right in search results (this feature is rolling out over the coming weeks),” Google software engineer Wanda Hung. “Another way you can engage with authors is to comment directly to them on

Google+. Now if an author shares an article on Google+ and they get comments on it, you'll see a link on the search results page to view the comments in Google+. Google shows this example: As we've said repeatedly, it's clear that who you are is more important in Google's eyes than ever. In August, Google's Othar Hansson, "It's obviously early days, so we hope to use this information and any information as a ranking signal at Google. In this case, we want to get information on credibility of authors from all kinds of sources, and eventually use it in ranking. We're only experimenting with that now. Who knows where it will go?" By the way, in terms of comments showing up, don't forget that there is likely also afor sites on the way.,, A couple months ago, HP announced it was for spinning off its PC business, but has now announced that it will keep it instead. In a statement, the company said it has completed its evaluation of strategic alternatives for its Personal Systems Group (PSG), and has decided that the unit will remain part of the company. "HP objectively evaluated the strategic, financial and operational impact of spinning off PSG. It's clear after our analysis that keeping PSG within HP is right for customers and partners, right for shareholders, and right for employees," said President and CEO Meg Whitman. "HP is committed to PSG, and together we are stronger." Whitman was appointed to her position last month, replacing Leo Apotheker after just a year in the role. The company says the strategic review involved "subject matter experts from across the businesses and functions," and that "data-driven evaluation revealed the depth of the integration that has occurred across key operations such as supply chain, IT and procurement." The evaluation, HP says, also detailed the significant extent to which the PSG unit contributes to the company's portfolio and overall brand value. Yeah, I can see that. HP added that the cost of recreating these things in a standalone company outweighed the benefits of separation. "As part of HP, PSG will continue to give customers and partners the advantages of product innovation and global scale across the industry's broadest portfolio of PCs, workstations and more," said Todd Bradley, EVP of HP's Personal Systems Group. "We intend to make the leading PC business in the world even better."
